

- The <header> and <nav> elements are block-level elements, which means they take up the full width of their parent container.
- The <h1> element is an inline element, which means it flows within the text and doesn't create a new line.
- The  elements with the class image-container have been styled using the .image-container class selector in CSS.
- The  element with the id main has been styled using the #main id selector in CSS.
